

The empirical literature has found an association between low rates of borrowing from friends and recent high-risk lending. Because most firms have low risk, about three-quarters of respondents report that they have good relationships with their friends, although it is not clear whether this is because they have good credit or because the friends have higher risk tolerance. Personal contacts and family members were also found to exhibit lower lending rates among individuals with lower risk profiles. Evidence suggests that this may be due to a lack of personal information about the individual. Family members and friends are less likely to know the individual's financial history, whereas friends are more likely to know the individual's social network. Family members are partly shown to have lower risk aversion, but avoid lending to others with lower creditworthiness. Family members are also less likely to lend to individuals with lower risk profiles.

Whichever movement's name it bears, personal development seems to continue independently of the theory one happens to like or not. In many a movement personal growth seems to be spontaneous, and a very interesting and unpredictable phenomenon. And this applies equally readily to conservative religious leaders as to radical religious leaders.

If the CIO is going to succeed, he must understand the company's culture, mission, vision and strategy. Otherwise, he will not have the right information to make informed decisions. He must also understand the company's strengths and weaknesses, as well as its opportunities and threats. This will help him identify potential risks and opportunities, and develop strategies to mitigate them. The CIO must also be able to communicate effectively with other stakeholders, such as the CEO, CFO, and other executives, to ensure alignment and buy-in for the proposed changes. Finally, the CIO must be a leader who can inspire and motivate his team to work towards common goals.
