Abstract—The authors examined the effects of a 12-week, supervised, group-based, low-impact aerobically and resistance training program on the quality of gait in young women with self-reported osteoarthritis, chronic, or acute low-back pain. A secondary aim was to investigate the relationship between gait and perceived physical function. The authors hypothesized that the 12-week program would produce a more efficient gait pattern, as evidenced by a reduction in the number of steps taken and an increase in stride length.
