E. T. A. Hoffmann, 2016-01-08 CHAPTER I Who is there over the wide world who has not at one period or another in a more or less degree felt the mysterious influences of love Whoever thou art then courteous reader who shalt after the lapse of years turn over these papers recall I beseech you to recollection that noontide interval of dazzling brightness contemplate once more that beautiful image which came like an impersonization of the abstract spirit of love from divine regions to meet you At that time it was through her through her alone that thou seemedst assured of thine own existence Canst thou not yet remember how the rushing streams the waving trees and the balmy winds of evening spoke to thee in articulate and intelligible accents of her and of the prevailing passion which possessed thy whole heart and soul Canst thou yet behold how the flowers unfolded their bright beaming eyes bearing to thine from her kisses and salutation Yet suppose that she herself had actually come that she vowed to be thine and thine only to live for thee alone then didst thou fold her in thy embraces and it seemed as if Heaven opened its eternal realms to receive you as if thou couldst raise thyself with her above all the petty sorrows or enjoyments of this every day and earthly sphere Yet scarcely hadst thou formed such hopes ere she was lost The bland illusion was broken No longer couldst thou hear the music of her celestial voice and only the sorrowful complaints of the despairing and forsaken lover sounded amid the desolate loneliness
